The Colorado COVID-19 Relief Fund was established in March 2020 with the purpose of raising and allocating funds to ensure the most acute community needs across the state were being addressed for those disproportionately affected by the far-reaching health, economic, and social impacts of COVID-19.

The rapid response fund included seven rounds of funding, each with a two-week turnaround from application deadline to funding distribution - the first five of which took place from April through June, and the final two rounds occurring in October and December 2020. Funding decisions were made by a review committee process that included more than 40 representatives from the business, philanthropic, nonprofit sectors as well as public officials. Additionally, the Community Voices Committee provided ongoing data, analysis, and insights to the review committees to shape the Fund’s priority areas of focus and criteria for funding decisions.

Mile High United Way provided support for fundraising and distribution of funds, and The Colorado Health Foundation provided operational support for the application portal, grant review process, and overall coordination of the Fund. Support and pro bono services were also provided by Fluxx.
The Colorado COVID Relief Fund is committed to equitably allocating funds to Coloradans across the state. Over seven rounds, we funded grants serving Coloradans in all 64 counties. The geographic distribution of applications, as well as grants awarded, largely reflected Colorado’s population centers and where community-based organizations serving disproportionately affected are located. Additionally, the Relief Fund intentionally prioritized organizations run by people of color as well as organizations serving those most vulnerable in our state.

COVID-19 has exposed many systematic inequalities nationwide and here in Colorado, The Fund identified 15 priority populations (see below graph) of Coloradans who have been disproportionately affected, particularly due to race and socioeconomic status. Of the priority populations, organizations serving people living on low incomes, children in low-income households, lower-wage and displaced workers, communities of color, and older Coloradans living on low incomes were the most common focus for the Fund grantees.

Food assistance, housing assistance/supports, and other basic human needs and services were the predominate need both in terms of applicant requests and what’s been funded. PPE, child care/early childhood, technology assistance, direct economic assistance (for displaced workers), mental health services and support, assistance for domestic violence shelters, and assistance and support for other shelters, service providers, and people experiencing homelessness were also among the top needs.

The Relief Fund is still accepting donations via check and wire. Funds will continue to be distributed to organizations in need by the eleven regional United Ways across the state. Colorado COVID Relief Fund Partners are currently working on grantee evaluations as well as a comprehensive evaluation of the program itself.
